Social Norms & Skills Training: Motivating Campus Change

This study evaluates a multi-component online personalized feedback intervention (PFI) with simultaneous delivery (i.e., all components at once) versus sequential delivery (i.e., individual components are delivered one at a time to minimize attention demands for each component) and seeks to enhance magnitude and duration of effects through adding text-message-based boosters to address specific high-risk drinking events during the year following intervention.

Personalized mobile app: Challenging alcohol expectancies to reduce high-risk drinking and consequences.

The purpose of this research is to develop a mobile phone intervention for 2- and 4-year college students with real-time feedback using individuals' daily expectancies, use, and consequences, building on two NIAAA-endorsed strategies for addressing high-risk college student drinking: challenging alcohol-related social expectancies, traditionally done through in-vivo experimental designs, and electronic personalized feedback.

Choosing to regulate: An fMRI Investigation of autonomous vs. controlled self-regulation and substance use in late adolescence

This project aims to validate the use of food craving reappraisal as a developmentally appropriate model of appetitive self-regulation in the context of substance use and characterize the ability of autonomous and controlled regulation to predict substance use trajectories during the transition to college, above and beyond other established risk factors.
